Sœurs (Marina & Audrey)

statement of intent

I decided to write Soeurs (Marina & Audrey) in October 2017, the day after we first rehearsed the scene Marina Hands and Audrey Bonnet share in Actrice at the Bouffes du Nord Theatre. To write or to stage is to answer calls. There, neither Marina nor Audrey asked me anything. They rehearsed. But what I saw in front of me carried such force. Their energies were so complementary, that I decided to respond to these forces, to these combined energies. That day I saw what Soeurs (Marina & Audrey) would become a few months later. A great conflict between two sisters that are at once divided and united by all. A fight to the death. Step by step. Word by word. Body to body. To say to each other, through this violence between sisters, one thing only : the love they feel.

Pascal Rambert, paris, september 2018

Sœurs (Marina & Audrey)

interview with Pascal Rambert, Marina Hands and Audrey Bonnet (1/6)

How was the idea for the project born? You saw Marina and Audrey together in Actrice and felt the need to bring back this duo of sisters?

Pascal : Yes, I recall very clearly : it was the first rehearsal of the scene between the two sisters in Actrice. Once it was over, I realized the right energy was present. It was obvious to me. I already had an idea to write a text about two sisters, in connection with another project of mine in Spain, but I had to verify it first. I remember going home and telling myself : there, I can write this text for the two of them. What was unexpected was that I didn't know I would write it so fast.

In truth, the reality of this desire [to write] comes every time as an answer to something. The first time I saw them in rehearsal, I saw something powerful. A calling. Something summoning me to write, a call I must answer. In fact, it's not that I feel the desire to write a specific thing, but the fact that I must respond to what I see before me. Something transpires in their acting and I have to respond. From the moment this feeling unlocks in me, I can't hold back. The language is so strong, growing from the inside, and I cannot contain it. The energy engaged towards that thing I see is so strong that I cannot stop until the play is completed. Once it sets off, I have no control over it. So, I saw something that second day of rehearsal and from that moment on I knew I had to proceed. I had no choice. But this lack of choice is a pleasure. An immense pleasure. What I know is that both [Marina and Audrey] come together around something which is crystal clear in my mind but not for the audience upon hearing their words. Something went wrong during their mother's death. Marina was there and something was said in that moment. There is a true discrepancy about something which rests between a lie and lack of attention, something indiscernible about the fact of not having been warned in time. And there is a discrepancy also concerning their respective partners.

Once again, like in Actrice, death is what allows beings who love each other but no longer see each other to reconnect and finally communicate. How do you explain this omnipresence of death in the relations between human beings?

Pascal : Ten years ago, I decided my writing would revolve around these questions. I have always been touched by Perdican's monologue in Musset's play On ne badine pas avec l'amour : we can do whatever we wish, the only thing that matters is to have loved. I repeated these words too often performing the piece with Emmanuelle Béart. I did it again in my play Reconstitution, as the character dies from breast cancer. Family, proximity to death, unfulfilled or wrongly fulfilled love affairs, that's my stamp.

Sœurs (Marina & Audrey)

interview with Pascal Rambert, Marina Hands and Audrey Bonnet (2/6)

It's not a very large area, but the important thing is that I manage to cross it. Architecture deals with the same theme. It's a story of people who die, who come back, who speak to each other through ghosts. It's a complete shadow. Argument also unlocked something in me concerning the use of time. I freed myself from the obligation of real time, of creating something realistic. This allows me to touch different historical periods. It allows me not to be stuck in the contemporary world. I always have the impression of living in a world that is my world, that is the world of my words. I have constituted a world for myself and I live inside a bubble of words. In Sœurs (Marina & Audrey), there are no ghosts. It's head on.

You often write about theater in a familial context. Is everything connected for you? Is theater a family history?

Pascal : It is a new family, my chosen family. Every time, it's a new family we choose for ourselves. Since I don't like my family, I choose another one. The first play I wrote in 1989, Les Parisiens, was all about this. It was an immense family dispute between brothers, sisters, and Jean-Paul Roussillon, a sort of ogre, at times kind and at times mad, who eats his children.

You are fascinated by the relationship that exists between two sisters. Why?

Pascal: I have always lived with women who had sisters, and at the beginning of my career I worked with two sisters, two Iranians – I spent so much of my time with them for almost fifteen years. Being Iranian, they both had a very strong, volcanic temperament. And since we were constantly working together, we were always high-strung. There was always a great tension between them, and at the same time a feeling of being together until the very end. Being a writer, it's great for me to have these two extremes. It's like when a choreographer teaches a dancer that to jump high, they have to push into the ground very hard : one must seek support deep into the floor to be able to rise higher. And I love this, I love these opposing tensions, this desire to live far apart, to not see each other, to not share things, and then to come back and reconnect around an event that took place. For me this energy works with the two forces that are Marina and Audrey, and it works in a sort of double postulation of energy that I already had in me, related to this project. Since right after the French premiere I will start creating the Spanish version, it is the first time in my life that I am writing – and this is great – for two characters in a play with four bodies in mind. That is to say, I write for Marina and Audrey and also for Barbara Lennie and Irene Escolar.

Sœurs (Marina & Audrey)

interview with Pascal Rambert, Marina Hands and Audrey Bonnet (3/6)

I have already worked with Barbara, and I have seen Irene on stage several times in Spain. So there is a quadruple energy present which is truly great. I never imagined it would happen to me. So it will be very strong.

Will the sisters in this play be « two monsters who are opposed in all », like in Actrice ?

Pascal : They are not two monsters, that is what the mother says in Actrice, it is her opinion, not mine. It is not my opinion about the two women. First of all it is a play with no story. There is no plot, no subject matter. I prefer speaking in terms of energies. Telling the story of two sisters who fight is of no interest to me. What is important is the freedom of interpretation that comes hand in hand with the text I will provide them, as I have already done with Répétition. Two blocks of energy. I think we can achieve this without having to stage the piece like Actrice, but through the real, organic relationship between the two bodies in space. This is why I thought of having an empty space, and retrieving the imitation wood table and chairs from Actrice : having this scenery present in a matter-of-fact way, that has nothing to do with the story being told. I always know my first lines, and I know Marina will begin by saying : "You do not come to my workplace...". When I say this is a great conflict between two sisters, I reveal all and nothing. The power of this conflict lies on two elements : the power of their exchange – an oral exchange that is, since this piece will be rooted in orality, much more than some of my other recent work – and the organic call and response that occurs in real space and time. It is something that is not staged, that is rediscovered every night. We will need to take good physical care because it is going to be extremely hard.

Marina, Audrey, you played together for the first time in Actrice. What was that experience like?

Audrey : It's like a gift, a dream come true. Something quite unreal to begin with, still to this day. I always have a little thing that unlocks at some point during the performance where I realize I am telling myself : "We are doing it. We are talking onstage". Not only during but after the show. I always had this feeling that Marina and I crossed paths at the end of the show. With something I felt coming from Marina too, a sort of respect filling the air between us, of recognition of the work being done, that every time we crossed paths after the show I have plenty of memories of holding each other in our arms, of comforting. As if we already knew. It is safe to say that our experience of the show is very different, but there is something we know instinctively about the other in this moment. I say "we" because I feel it.

Sœurs (Marina & Audrey)

interview with Pascal Rambert, Marina Hands and Audrey Bonnet (4/6)

Marina : There is something along the lines of gratitude. I can't say what exactly, but it is like a family thing, knowing where we are and where we come from and that we are more or less on the same planet. That is the feeling I have. A very strong feeling of being safe, that I had never felt before in my life, when I am onstage with Audrey. That is to say that the walls of the theater could crumble, the audience members could leave, break their chairs, nothing would stop us. It never stops. The moment when she enters the stage, I feel it energetically. It is very strange, simultaneously soothing me and enlarging the playing space to infinity, since there is no more fear, no more limits. I never experienced this before, I never worked with this level of trust before in my life. And it is the same with Pascal. But with Audrey this trust exists at a very grounded level. You have the captain and the soldier with you on the field. It is a very strong association and it allows something lived which is incredibly difficult to describe.

Pascal : I would like to return to the word safety. It is a beautiful word. It corresponds with what I did writing Sœurs (Marina & Audrey). I know that what I wrote would find itself safely inside a moment of real time. Because it will be in real time. Clôture de l'amour was in real time too. But there is an axe, a diagonal in the staging. In Sœurs (Marina & Audrey), this diagonal will move a lot and never be fixed, never decided upon in advance. So I think I will give them the text, they will learn it, we will do a first read-through together and then we will start working in the space. There are nonetheless laws of positioning, of listening, that we already explored in Répétition. Once we have integrated these floor rules, then rehearsals can be alive every day. Then they will master the text completely and the energies will be like those seen in Actrice. Because every time I watch the show, it allows me to move forward with the proposals I can make. What is crazy is that, if we take the sisters' scene in Actrice alone, which contains nonetheless a very strong conflict, Audrey can hold Marina in her arms and it still works. In Répétition, for example, since we said different things each day in a different space, there are evidently some days when it works and some days when it doesn't work. And that is the beauty of it too, the beauty that will be Sœurs (Marina & Audrey). If one night Audrey is less aggressive than the night before, or Marina says her first line softer, it will change and influence things. Therefore it is this obsession I am after. This obsession of the right answer, not of an answer pre-determined by the director. Think that what happens onstage is a sort of umbilical cord on which we try to place words, an umbilical cord which is a kind of elastic bond between people.

Sœurs (Marina & Audrey)

interview with Pascal Rambert, Marina Hands and Audrey Bonnet (5/6)

Marina, Audrey, is it an even stronger experience for you to play sisters?

Audrey : I already feel like Marina is my sister. If we had not been sisters in Actrice, we would still be sisters in some way or another.

Marina : Overall, I do not think in terms of characters. In Actrice for instance, I do not personally think everything I say to her. It does not correspond with what I think, and I believe Audrey feels the same. But I am nonetheless going to play the role as it must be played, even if it is not in direct correlation with me. So for Audrey, I do not know who she is. It is not about us. The stories we tell are not necessarily reflective of us. What is certain is that with Audrey I feel that we summon something that acts upon us and the people in the theatre with us. We summon things. I am obsessed by ghosts in the theater, because I feel that people's thoughts start bubbling at the same time and circulating through space. And we are a sort of transit area. There is a communion. And I feel that when we speak this thing happens. After the story we tell, it is the story Pascal tells.

Audrey : Pascal, what you say about being compelled to write, is the same for us when we have the text and start playing it. Little does it matter what we think about it, it puts something in motion. It is your writing that causes this and allows it to exist.

Pascal : There are parallel lives. When you live your life, I am thinking about you, writing for you. This continuity is beautiful, this continuity between beings that allows me to watch, every night, the body of Marina, the body of Audrey, and to associate them. It's extremely powerful. There is a constant porosity in the work. There is an almost mute relationship and I think we must preserve this. It takes the shape of trust, of mystery among beings. I don't need to know more. It is like those artists who are able to draw the face and essential traits of a person. It is the same in literature : it is not about the life of Marina or Audrey, but I take those things in them which belong to a sort of magnetism. Magnetism is an interesting word. And then we see the energy of potential, the interior engine. The interior engines of Audrey and Marina, they come together on a detail which is not to lie in the present moment. They do not lie to each other at the present moment. Each night, they are faced with a present moment and their personal histories makes it such that they do not lie to each other in this present. That is what I see. There where others recite, they maintain the truth of the present moment. What I know is that in Soeurs (Marina & Audrey), the two of them empty themselves through the immense blame they place on each other. They exhaust each other with love. After hours and hours, what remains is this incredible thing that unites them both. This immense conflict unfolds into the evidence of the love that binds them. Once they have lost all their armor, they will end up in each other's arms. That is the spiral. And in this way of working, from the moment they take the stage there is only breath. Each one can do her work in this real present moment which is already what happens in Actrice. It will be a show at the edge of life and death.

interview with Pascal Rambert, Marina Hands and Audrey Bonnet (6/6)

Marina : Even having the show in my body, the moment of the fight between the two sister in Actrice consumes me.

Pascal : Yes, this intense relationship, this is Sœurs (Marina & Audrey). We cannot enter on stage with any less intensity than that.

Marina : It is a mysterious and deep bond, but also an inexplicable one. There is no logic to it. There is a place of very intimate encounter, a place of depth. I don't know why, when I see Audrey onstage I cry, I am in a strange state of mind. This opening statement is great : you saw something in rehearsal, and you said to yourself "I must respond to this energy and let them build the show night after night".
